

Matt Burt, Alaska's Escape, Pg. 133

- Alaska bursts into Miles' and Colonel's room, screaming and crying. She convinces them to help her leave Culver Creek for an unknown reason.

You have a friend who had been drinking, was distraught, and clearly in no condition to drive; How would you deal with that situation?

I would attempt to reason with him/her. Miles and the Colonel were available to keep her under control. Miles was sober, if a little tired, and the Colonel wasn't nearly as drunk as Alaska. With Alaska being that drunk, it should not have been too hard to convince her to be rational. Pudge and the Colonel knew what they should've done, but didn't, and Alaska died because of it.
